Microsoft has come under fire for requiring developers to sign licenses for software that would normally be considered free. The Windows developer license agreement ("WLDA") is an agreement that developers must sign to get software from the Windows Marketplace for Windows Phone and Windows Store. Developers receive Windows Phone 7 and Windows 8 apps as part of a much larger Windows software bundle, the Windows App Store. Microsoft requires developers to sign the WLDA to use apps from the Windows App Store. The WLDA states, in section 2.2: "Except where otherwise expressly provided by this License Agreement, any new software for which you are a developer shall be provided to you free of charge by Microsoft." The WLDA is found in section 5 of the Windows Phone 7 and Windows 8 developer license agreement. Section 5.2 of the Windows Phone 7 license states: "Your use of the software shall be subject to the terms and conditions of this License Agreement." And section 5.3 of the Windows 8 license states: "Your use of the software shall be subject to the terms and conditions of this License Agreement." This means that any new software that you develop with Microsoft for Windows Phone or Windows Store is currently subject to the terms of the license you agreed to when you received your development kit. Microsoft has argued that new Windows Phone apps and Windows Store apps
