Technical Field The present invention relates in general to telecommunication systems, and in particular, to a method of operating a telephone over a common carrier channel to a static telephone in a home. Still more particularly, the present invention relates to a method of operating a telephone for a user that has stored incoming calls therein.

2. Description of the Related Art Home telephone customers are commonly connected to a central office by a loop formed by a pair of conductors which have been twisted together and which pass through a hole or a panel in the wall of the home. The twisted pair of conductors form the loop that is connected to a jack mounted in the wall. When an incoming call is placed at a Public Switched Telephone Network (PSTN), such as the phone located at the user's residence, the incoming call is routed to a Voice response unit (VRU) or a private branch exchange (PBX) in the central office which answers the call and transmits caller ID information. The VRU or PBX then delivers the incoming call to the static telephone within the home. In the present-day telecommunications environment, there are numerous different telephones that are designed to connect to a loop forming a home telephone line. For example, in one type of home telephone, as described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,416,717 to Simons et al., the home telephone receives at least one telephone line, which is terminated to provide a loop extending to the home telephone, and other telephones are connected directly or indirectly to the home telephone using the loop. In another example, as described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,506,906 to Hood et al., the home telephone, as well as the other telephone devices in the home are terminated on one or more telephone lines. Most of today's telephone services are connected through a central office and there are static telephones within the home or office. These telephones are connected to a telephone line which delivers them to a telephone company central office for access to the Public Switched Telephone Network (PSTN). In the future, it is expected that users may wish
