Automatic cable manager 13.7 crack. that Trump is mentally "temporarily insane." Trump has always been a little bit crazy — but now there is no stigma attached to that The level of rhetoric we've been seeing from Trump this month is quite unique. For example, there are numerous claims that he is consciously acting insane as part of a covert strategy. There are descriptions of his paranoia and even references to it as "sickness." There are also many comments that describe Trump as having some kind of mental illness or infirmity. The most notorious example of this comes from the Time magazine article on May 24th, which said Trump is "temporarily insane." Many have insisted this was an intentional mis-word of "irrational," which is the term normally used for people who have mental illness. But the fact is they used the word "temporarily," which conveys that he is currently mentally unstable. While they went on to describe his "crazy-making" behavior, there is no mention of his mental health. But the fact of the matter is that Trump has always been a little bit crazy — but now there is no stigma attached to that.

Any criticism is immediately turned against the press — and everything is framed as a mental health issue that is undermining our democracy. This sets up a very chilling effect for people with mental health issues. And if it is now normal to say that Trump is insane, how will people who are genuinely ill be treated? This is in contrast to the Clinton campaign, which has largely stayed away from this, possibly because of concerns about the stigma around mental illness. But it has recently changed its tone in response to Trump's unrestrained rhetoric on Hillary. In a recent interview, Hillary herself said she was "so confident" in her health, and that "honestly, I don't think that people should be questioned about their health."

But she then pointed to Trump, saying that "when I'm out on the trail, people seem to be very
