However, these types of power tools can be quite dangerous if the user is not careful. This is because cordless power tools do not have a cord from which to lose in the event of a user's hand slipping and contacting the tool. One type of known cordless power tool uses a two motor design. A first motor is used to provide rotational and/or oscillatory motion and the second motor is used to provide torque. The two motors of the known design are spaced from one another and are disposed in such a way as to avoid contact with the user. For example, the motors are spaced from one another and above the tool base which includes the battery housing and the tool's handle and motor housing. However, in the known design, the distance between the two motors is limited by the position and dimension of the tool's tool housing. The position of the tool's tool housing is dictated by the size and shape of the tool's motor housing which is typically large and is therefore disposed at a distance from the tool's handle. As a result, the tool's housing is relatively large and, as a result, the tool is bulky and heavy. These shortcomings make using and moving the tool difficult in a number of situations, especially those involving a user who is either heavy or clumsy. For example, a user may be a heavy person and the tool may be bulky and heavy enough to cause the tool to tip forward or backwards when being used. Thus, a more compact and light weight cordless power tool would be desirable. In other cases, a user
